ORANGE-BELLIED PARROTS RETURN TO TASMANIA'S SOUTH-WEST IN UNEXPECTEDLY HIGH NUMBERS

It is a species so endangered that just five years ago only 20 birds returned from the species' annual migration. But now 81 orange-bellied parrots have returned to Melaleuca in Tasmania's remote south-west from the mainland to breed, the largest number seen in 15 years.

It is a turning point for critically endangered species, which requires considerable human intervention to avoid extinction.

"It's looking like a healthy season ahead in terms of breeding," program manager Dr Shannon Troy said. "The population does seem to be really growing now."

But, Dr Troy warns, the parrot is still one of the most endangered species in Australia and one of the most endangered birds in the world.

"We need to move from a phase of preventing their extinction into starting to grow the population," she said. "We're probably reaching that turning point now and starting to look ahead to what's next."

Dr Troy said the program's objective was to have a self-sustaining population that required limited management intervention.

"The next phase is to look at how we encourage this population to be more self-sustaining and increase wild behaviours like foraging and nesting in natural hollows."

This year's state budget contained an additional $1.3 million towards tracking the parrots on their migration and maintaining the Five Mile Beach facility where birds are bred in captivity.

A risky flight

The orange-bellied parrot migrates to mainland Australia every autumn and returns to Tasmania to breed over summer however not every bird makes it home.

"A lot of us spend the whole spring holding our breath waiting to see what's going to happen," Dr Troy said.

This year, 139 birds departed Melaleuca, with 58 not making it back — but a return rate of more than 50 per cent is considered high.

The returns include 24 wild born birds and six captive bred juveniles from last season that made the journey for the first time. In the past, the survival rate for first-timers has dropped as low as 15 per cent.

"The releases of juveniles from the captive population at the end of the season seems to be working really well and they are coming back in good numbers," Dr Troy said.

She said a planned Parks and Wildlife Service burn around Melaleuca increased food plants, so the birds were feeding on natural foods which helped survival rates.

Power of volunteers

Saving the orange-bellied parrot from extinction has required team work from staff with the government-funded orange-bellied parrot program, partnering with institutions for captive breeding as well as volunteers at Melaleuca daily between September and April.

Volunteers count how many birds they see and the identity of the birds over six months, as well as looking for health issues and predators.

"They are absolutely key to the monitoring that we do," Dr Troy said. "That really helps us to understand what we are doing in terms of our management that's working or not working. It's a huge team effort."

Parrot migration 'unusual'

Dr Troy said other than the swift parrot, the orange-bellied parrot was the only other parrot that makes a full migration.

"There are other smaller birds all over the world and in Australia that undertake journeys that are even longer, but it's very unusual for a parrot to be doing this."

She said while the birds don't fly together, there is safety in numbers.

"The adult birds act as a beacon to show the juveniles where to go," she said.

The birds move from button grass plains to salt marshes to feed during the non-breeding period.

"If they've never seen that habitat before it would be hard for them to recognise what is and isn't a food plant," she said. "We think they use the other birds that have already migrated as a cue and move to where those birds already are."

"If they've never seen that habitat before it would be hard for them to recognise what is and isn't a food plant," she said. "We think they use the other birds that have already migrated as a cue and move to where those birds already are."

Breeding begins

The orange-bellied parrot program provides nest boxes at Melaleuca so the birds have somewhere safe to breed and lay eggs.

Dr Troy said there are already some eggs, and nest checks will be done in January with the hope there'll be chicks.

Of the birds that returned, 50 were male, and 31 were female, which Dr Troy said is preferred.

"It's desirable to be that way round, ideally we'd have the females being able to have some mate choice and choosing the male they want," she said.

Captive-bred birds that are released will also be male-heavy.

"The ladies can be courted by a few males and decide in advance who is likely to be the best provisioner and father of their young."

The next step

Dr Troy said as the program begins to move from saving the parrots from extinction to growing the population the birds will need to learn to feed independently. The birds are currently given supplementary food.

"We're starting to think about scaling back the food so we're just using the food during monitoring times and the rest of the time they need to forage on their own," she said. "They'd also need to find their own homes and to be breeding in tree hollows instead of nest boxes," she said.

Dr Troy said the birds will also need to be able to withstand some loss to the population, so if a predator or health issue takes out a few birds it wouldn't have a catastrophic effect on the population trend.

At some point the population needs to get large enough that we're not having to manage individual birds and individual nests

AUSTRALIA'S MYSTERIOUS HYBRID BIRD

DISCOVERED IN 1867 in Brisbane (in Indooroopilly, within walking distance of my house), Rawnsley's bowerbird was shiny blue with golden wings, marking it out as unique. But it fitted what you might get if a satin bowerbird got too chummy with a regent bowerbird. The naturalist who named it, Sylvester Diggles, discounted this by citing a sighting from central Queensland.

Arguments followed about whether the blue regent, as it was also called, was real. The feuding even made the Sydney Mail newspaper in the 1870s. However, with no sightings in later decades, the hybrid argument won, and the bird was all but forgotten during the 20th century.

Then, in 2003, one was photographed near Lamington National Park in southern Queensland. And another was photographed a decade later near Coffs Harbour in NSW. The 'species' still counts as a hybrid, but as one to keep an eye out for. More are likely in the future.

Bowerbirds are more apt than most birds to make mistakes, because the genders only come together briefly to mate. Females do all the work of building a nest, incubating eggs and rearing young.

That said, hybrids sometimes arise among birds that spend weeks together. There was surprise when a new species of wader, Cox's sandpiper, was named in South Australia in 1982. All the sandpipers that feed in Australia migrate through Asia to breed in the Arctic, limiting the chances that a species could escape detection for so long. Cox's sandpiper found its way into a leading field guide, but genetic work showed it to be a hybrid between the curlew sandpiper and pectoral sandpiper – two species that look similar.

Hybrid fairy-wrens, with the red of the red-backed fairy-wren and blue of another species, sometimes show up, without inspiring talk of new species. Their origin is easy to explain. Radio telemetry shows that male fairy-wrens often pursue secret dalliances, doing so in thick vegetation shortly before dawn, when it is too dark to see well. Even in good light the females of different species look very similar.

These hybrids count as mistakes, but some mixed matings are beneficial. For eucalypts, hybridisation is thought to serve as an 'insurance policy' that helps them acquire from other species the genes they need to survive a changing climate.

BIRD NESTBOX DOUBLES AS A FAKE SPEED CAMERA

A man who built his own "speed camera" out of a bird box says he is willing to do anything to make the road outside his house safer.

Nick Porter built and put up the device on the A1017 between High Garrett and Gosfield in Essex in December. He said vehicles regularly reached speeds of 80 to 90mph - where the limit is 60mph and reduces to 40mph entering Gosfield and High Garrett.

"We don't feel safe here," Mr Porter told the BBC. There have been several road traffic incidents in the stretch between the two villages in recent years, including one in 2014 when three people were killed.

Mr Porter says he and his neighbours had repeatedly asked for the speed limit to be reduced, including offering to pay for any signage, but had now taken matters into their own hands.

"I saw the bird box 'speed camera' idea online and it has worked," Mr Porter said. "The traffic is noticeably a little bit slower now which is great, but once people realise it's not a proper speed camera, they'll just speed up again - but something needs to be done."

Mr Porter said his neighbours had even explored the possibility of buying a car to park on the road to create a traffic-calming measure

"Obviously we don't want to have to do it because if something happens, it'll then be on our conscience," he said. "But it's getting to the stage where it's either that, or it could be one of our children. We're left with very limited options."

Halstead councillor Chris Siddall, who chairs the local highways panel, says he sympathised with the residents and had recommended that the speed limit should be reduced to 40mph.

"It's really important that speed limits feel right for the motorist," he said, adding that "if people feel the speed limit isn't correct, they'll ignore it."

Forty miles an hour does feel a reasonable speed to drive along that section of road."

A spokesperson for the Council says the authority conducts a full investigation following any fatal collision to establish if there were any highway-related contributory factors, as well as reviewing the previous 10 years of collision data.

They said added that any local safety concerns could be raised and brought to the attention of the local highways panel.

Braintree District Council told the BBC it had not received a planning application or any enforcement inquiries in relation to the imitation camera, and was unable to say if the structure required planning permission or not without viewing it first.

How'd you like some Baskin' robins?"

THREE YEARS UNTIL CARNABY'S COCKATOO STARVATION STARTS

Perth's endangered Carnaby's black cockatoos will begin to starve in three years after the state government logs what remains of their most significant remaining feeding site, BirdLife Australia has warned.

There were once 23,000 hectares of pine plantations across the Gnangara mound near Yanchep, north of Perth. After progressive harvests that's now 6000. The government plans to log the remainder with no large-scale revegetation strategy for the land.

There was a strategy to replace 5000 hectares of pines as a permanent food source: a small sub-section of a major Perth-Peel planning framework. But the government recently shelved this under the guise of COVID, with no announcement or replacement.

During the almost 10 years it took to launch, draft, review and dump the framework, the population of Carnaby's black cockatoo on the Perth-Peel Coastal Plain declined an estimated 35 per cent.

"People see a flock of 10 now, or hundreds, and think it's massive," BirdLife Australia black cockatoo project co-ordinator Adam Peck said. "In the past, 50 years ago, people would have seen flocks of thousands. They would blacken the sky."

On the night of the 2019 Great Cockey Count survey, 70 per cent of the entire count of Carnaby's black cockatoos, a species only found in south-west WA, was recorded in these pine plantations.

This was more than 9300 birds. One single roost in that area, which has over the past few years of the survey come to be known as the 'mega roost', had a count of more than 5000 birds, almost 40 per cent of all the Carnaby's cockatoos counted on the coastal plain.

Mr Peck said Labor, while in opposition, strongly criticised the Barnett government for doing nothing about black cockatoo habitat decline, but had since done no better.

There have been small revegetation projects: BirdLife Australia has planted 10,000 crowdfunded trees. The Department of Biodiversity, Conservation and Attractions has planted 15,000-20,000 seedlings in ex-plantation areas annually for the past five years.

But this represented 20-50 hectares a year, Mr Peck said.

"At the current rate it would take 750 years to revegetate," he said. "The cockatoos will be long gone by then."

The government points to the need to recharge the aquifer beneath, which supplies half of Perth's drinking water, as the reason for the lack of larger-scale revegetation plans.

But Mr Peck says the DBCA models currently in use for smaller scale plantings could work on a larger scale and allow aquifer recharge, while still providing a realistic additional food source within eight years.

"As they mature they will provide more but there will be a lag and that is why we want it to happen quickly," he said. "If we don't do this, the birds will starve and they won't breed."

DID YOU KNOW....

That the first captive breeding of Tourquoise Parrots was achieved in 1925 by a Mr G.A.Heumann in Sydney, NSW.

Since then they have become a popular aviary bird and the continuing development of new and advanced colours is only serving to increase the demand for these beautiful little neophemas.

POLYGAMOUS BIRDS SHOWN TO HAVE FEWER HARMFUL MUTATIONS

Bird species that breed with several sexual partners have fewer harmful mutations, according to a study led by the Milner Centre for Evolution at the University of Bath. The study, published in Evolution, shows for the first time how polygamy increases the efficiency of natural selection in wild populations.

Most birds pair up with a single mate each season, with some species like swans or geese mating for life. In contrast, some bird species are polygamous, having several partners per breeding season, however it is unclear why they have evolved a different mating system.

An international team of scientists led by Bath analyzed the genomes of 150 bird species, spanning all the major bird families and from locations across the world, including six species that were sequenced for the first time.

By counting differences between the genes inherited from the individual's mother and father (termed the heterozygosity), they were able to estimate the level of genetic diversity across each species.

They also looked at the frequency of gene mutations in each species and whether they changed the sequence of proteins for which they coded or were "silent." The former, called non-synonymous polymorphisms, are often detrimental to the individual, whereas silent mutations are generally harmless.

Contrary to their expectations, they found that polygamous species on the whole were no more diverse than monogamous ones, although the small number of species with polygamous females did have higher than expected genetic diversity.

They also found that, relative to the number of silent mutations, the polygamous species had significantly fewer potentially damaging mutations that changed the protein sequence.

Kees Wanders, Ph.D. student in the University of Bath's Department of Life Sciences is first author of the paper.

He said, "Species evolve through natural selection, where harmful mutations are removed from the population in the long term because individuals with the mutation don't survive long enough to breed, or individuals with beneficial adaptations survive for longer."

"However, species also evolve through sexual selection, where evolution is shaped by individuals competing for access to mates, so that only the most desirable characteristics are successfully passed down to offspring."

"This research suggests that sexual selection aligns with natural selection in birds, so that harmful mutations are removed more efficiently in polygamous populations, where sexual selection is particularly strong."

"We still don't know exactly why some bird species are polygamous when most pair up for a breeding season or even for life."

"There are many different theories about why polygamy evolved in these species, but we've found the first evidence that it increases the efficiency of natural selection by rooting out harmful mutations and avoiding the effects of inbreeding."

"It's been previously observed by others in the lab in fruit flies, but this is the first time it's been observed in wild populations of birds."

Dr. Araxi Urrutia, Senior Lecturer at the Milner Centre for Evolution at the University of Bath and last author of the paper, said, "I had a hypothesis that in polygamous species, where individuals can't easily find a mate and have to travel further to find a breeding partner, that this would mean that there would be more genetic diversity in these species."

"However, we were surprised to find there was no evidence for this—instead we found that these species had fewer harmful mutations."

"Despite this apparent evolutionary advantage, most birds tend to stick together to raise their chicks because it gives their offspring a better chance of survival."

The data for this study was collected as part of the B10K Project, with scientists from China, Wales, Denmark, Hungary, Germany, Netherlands and Mexico contributing to the research.

IN MEMORY OF PEG AND JOHN MROWKA

12 months after their passing

Peg and John passed away in March 2023. Peg passed on 1st March and John on 8th March. A combined funeral service was held on Saturday 11th March 2023 at Wyalong Cemetery. It was a bright, sunny day and many relatives and close friends attended. Some travelled long distances.

Peg and John were married for more than 67 years and had four children - Dianne, Peter, Christine and Marion.

Bird aviaries were established in the backyard in Moorebank and each family member had a specific type of bird that they used to exhibit. Peg and John were made Life Members of Rockdale Avicultural Society. John was Life Member of the Parrot Breeders and Exhibitors Society.

John was instrumental in the design and production of the Gloster Fancy club badge; working with Perfection Plate in Revesby and helped another Auburn Bird Club member to repair the Ring-making machine. He always put his hand up to assist with installing staging. With his multiple judging skills, he judged a variety of species at many different shows.

Peg was secretary and show secretary for several clubs and the children were kept busy with all the activities involved in managing a successful bird show.

Together they often hosted bird club meetings at their home and there were many bird club Christmas barbeques in the backyard.

Both Peg and John were honoured, separately, at the Canary and Cage Bird Federation Annual Dinner. John was honoured in 1981 and Peg several years later.

When the children had married and moved out, Peg and John decided to move to the country and purchased a house in Wyalong in 1990 where there was plenty of room in the backyard for bird aviaries. A local resident assisted with the aviaries and bird room build. They continued to exhibit birds for many years.

More recently, both Peg and John spent time enjoying the company of several small dogs and watching their birds in the backyard.

Vale – Peg and John. Your contributions to the caged bird world will be sadly missed
